Caveolin-1: a tool for chemotherapeutic targeted delivery. Caveolae are flask-shaped invaginations of the plasma membrane that have been found to be involved in endocytosis and intracellular trafficking. Caveolin-1, the principal structural component of caveolae, is expressed in many different tissues and its relative abundance in each of these tissues varies. Recent work has suggested that caveolae-dependent endocytosis may be a major pathway for the removal of many membrane proteins. As such, an alteration in caveolin-1 expression may have significant consequences for endocytosis and intracellular trafficking of many membrane proteins. Herein, we review the significance of caveolin-1 and the new evidence linking caveolin-1 to the processes of endocytosis, intracellular trafficking and regulation of signalling pathways. We discuss how these mechanisms, and a better understanding of their details, may be harnessed to create novel approaches to pharmaceutical and/or gene therapy.Project summary Childhood asthma affects approximately 5.1 million children, or 9.4% of all children, with an increase from 2.4 million to 3.0 million children affected annually over the last 20 years. A combination of demographic changes and genetic factors are likely to contribute to the increase in prevalence of childhood asthma in the US population. Animal and human studies suggest that the impact of fetal immune responses to maternal infections in utero may influence both the primary etiology of asthma and its progression. However, epidemiologic studies are limited in their ability to directly measure the association between maternal infection and childhood asthma. The proposed study will leverage existing data collected on maternal social participation in relation
